Touching true stories from people whom have survived the suicide of a loved one. With the epidemic number of deaths by suicide, most people will, at the very least, know someone that was a victim. Reading personal stories from those of us that loved a victim of suicide will give a personal insight to the "out of sight, out of mind" topic and, hopefully, will educate the readers as to the struggle of the survivors that live with the outdated stigma that the word suicide carries with it. This is not a book that delves into the causes of suicide, rather it is a compilation of love stories. The love of a son, daughter, brother. sister, father. mother, husband or wife that have left too soon. It’s a book that puts a face on the statistics.

Very moving and hope inspiring accounts of loss of loved ones by suicide. Outpouring of feelings, stressing remembering those who have died in their glory, not in their cause of death. I feel this is excellent reading for those of us who have suffered these tragic losses.

These stories are heart-felt and make you more aware of how suicide affects not only the person who died but everyone who loved him or her. Speaking from personal experience, the urge to commit suicide can be over-whelming to the point where nothing or nobody matters enough to stay at that moment. Depression is a terrible illness. Thank you, Karyl, for sharing your precious daughter's story and those of other loved ones left behind. Hugs to all.

This was a great way for me to get acquainted with the Parents of Suicide group that I wanted to attend. The frank discussions about suicide were difficult to read, but important. The grief and sorrow that parents face after such a tragedy simply cannot be understood or addressed appropriately by the other people around us: family, friends, even our doctors and therapists. Somehow, knowing that there is SOMEONE out there in the world who understands the many facets of our grief, makes hope a bit more accessible.

I chose five stars because I felt each story was learning and informative to me, having so far, not to have experienced this most dreaded of life and death tragedies. It did however, leave me wanting to know more of the psyche of the human mind.

I cannot believe there are over 60 stories in this volume. I'm proud to have contributed to this book. Looking forward to Volume 2.There is not much information concerning first hand accounts of losing someone to suicide. The book addresses this concern.Loved reading it. Made me feel I am not alone in my feelings.

The group did a nice job in putting this together. It is a public service to be so candid with your experiences since suicide has become so common, but not talked about as it should be. Have to be vigilant to help those struggling with issues in their lives. Mental health is something that society needs to really address.After becoming a survivor, you're always thinking how you may help others in dealing with this. I think this is one way besides being a tribute to those that we've lost.

Loving tribute for those the world was not strong enough to hold on to.
